In 1998 I went to China to learn to paint in Chinese ink on silk, and remained five years, Buried Wine teaching at the university level. These poems were written during that time. This book is dedicated to Xu Bo, whose name I do not know how to write in Chinese characters.

Once Present

On my granite windowsill, five golden pears point their long stems in the cardinal directions: my friend says, they are ecstatic. Below in the hutong the leaves are coins of light, from the braziers the scent of roasted sweet potatoes rises. A cart bicycle with its bed covered in torn fuchsia paper bears fruit toward winter. Next to the place where you once danced, torso rippling, in the restaurant aquarium a fish floats, belly up. I still look for you in crowds, your phosphorescent eyes, the yellow pennant of your hair, though now you have truly made yourself small like the members of the troupe from the provinces, who helped each other with their pink headbands and sashes before Buried Wine taking place in Buried Wine performing the lion dance for the agent from Beijing, eager and undimmed. Once present, you pressed so luxuriously against the content of my journey that you are woven into the fabric of China for me, as part of an ancient character is formed with a flourish of ink, memorized, as that for the moon was once a speckled oval, brought to mind by the flecked quail eggs that float dimly preserved in a glass jar on the shelf.
