"If I climb The Dragon's Boy that," he encouraged himself, The Dragon's Boy "I'll be able to see what I need to see." He meant, of course, he'd be able to see the castle from the small hillock and judge the distance home, maybe even locate a drier route. His feet were really cold The Dragon's Boy now, the water having gotten in over the tops of his boots in the stream and squishing up between his toes at every step. Not that the boots mattered. They were an old pair, Cai's castoffs, and had never really fit anyway. But he still didn't fancy walking all the way back squishing like that.

He'd never been on his own this far north of the castle before and certainly never would have planned coming out into the watery fens where the peat hags reigned. They could pull a big shire horse down, not even bothering to spit The Dragon's Boy back the bones. Everyone knew that.

"Blasted dog!" he swore again, hotly. "Blasted Boadie!" He felt a little better having said it aloud.

If the little tor had been a mountain he wouldn't have attempted it. Certainly neither he nor any of the other boys would dare go up the High Tor, which was the large mount northwest of the castle. It was craggy, with sheer sides, its top usually hidden in the mists. There was no easy path up. The High Tor had an evil reputation, Cai said. Princes who tried to climb it were still there, locked in the stone. Lancot said he'd The Dragon's Boy heard how the High King's only son had been whisked away there the day he'd been born and devoured by witches for their All Hallow's meal. Bedvere had only The Dragon's Boy recently recalled a rhyme his old Nanny Bess had taught him: "Up the Tor, Life's nae more."

But of course the hillock wasn't that tor and it would be the perfect place from which to get his bearings. So he slogged toward it, threading through the hummocks and the tussocky grass, forcing himself not to mind the water squishing up between his toes, following the tracks.

He was halfway up the tor and The Dragon's Boy halfway around it as well when he saw the cave.

"Hullo!" he whispered.

It was only an unprepossessing black hole in the rock and only a bit higher than himself, as round and as smooth as if it had been carved out by a master hand. The opening The Dragon's Boy was shaped into a rock that was as gray and slatey as the sky. There wasn't a single grain or vein running across the rockface to distinguish it, and Boadie's tracks had disappeared.

Nervously he ran his fingers through the tangles of his hair, his gooseberry-colored eyes wide. Then he stepped through the dark doorway. He went less out of courage than curiosity, being particularly careful of some long, spearlike rocks hanging from the ceiling of the cave just two steps beyond the opening.
