Note on The Russian Revolution: History in an Hour dates

Until January 1918, Russia used the 'Old Style' Julian Calendar that before 1900 was 12 days behind our Gregorian calendar, and after 1900, 13 days behind. This text uses the New Style throughout.

Introduction

The communist system unleashed by the Russian Revolution of 1917 was the greatest political experiment ever conducted. The Revolution promised freedom from the shackles of Imperialism, corruption and exploitation but until its collapse in 1991, the peoples The Russian Revolution: History in an Hour of the vast Soviet empire endured seventy years of misguided socialism and totalitarianism.

The last Russian Tsar, Nicholas II, ruled over a vast empire that was backward, impoverished and in some respects largely resentful of his autocratic rule. Its people demanded reform and change. The Russian Revolution: History in an Hour The effects of the outbreak of war in 1914 finally, in March 1917, brought down the Tsar and the 300-year-old Romanov dynasty.

The Provisional Government that replaced the Tsar proved equally ineffectual at addressing the needs of Russia's The Russian Revolution: History in an Hour major problems. Only the representatives of the workers, or 'Soviets', seemed to understand the problems that lay at the The Russian Revolution: History in an Hour heart of the empire. From the various Soviet parties it was the Bolshevik Party and its leader, Vladimir Lenin, that seized power and established the Soviet Union with its promises of a new socialist utopia. The consequences shaped the entire twentieth century and their ramifications were felt across the world.

This, in an hour, is the Russian Revolution.

Emancipation

On 3 March 1861, Alexander II issued what seemed on the face of it the most revolutionary reform in Russia's history – his 'Manifesto on the Emancipation of the Serfs'. The edict freed 23 million serfs from their bondage to landowners, and wrested ownership of 85 per cent of Russia's land from private landowners in favour of the peasants. The landlords, understandably, opposed such a sweeping change but were told by the Tsar, 'It is better to abolish serfdom from above than to wait for the time when it will begin to abolish itself from below.'

Alexander II, c.1870

The high ideals of Alexander II's emancipation of the serfs fell very short of its ambition. Landowners held onto 15 per cent of the land and this was, invariably, the best land; while peasants had to buy back their land from the nobles, usually at an inflated price. The majority were, inevitably, unable to afford the cost, and The Russian Revolution: History in an Hour were offered a loan by the government, repayable at 6 per cent over forty-nine years. The peasant, freed from serfdom, was no better off and no happier.

Twenty years later, on 13 March 1881, a group calling themselves the People's Will threw a bomb at the Tsar's carriage in St Petersburg, fatally wounding Alexander II. The Tsar's son (Alexander III) and twelve-year-old grandson (Nicholas II) were witness to Alexander's violent end. As future tsars they never forgot.

Ironically, Alexander II had, just hours before his death, put his signature to a draft decree to establish a parliament, a Duma, the first step towards a constitutional monarchy. He knew that the emancipation of the serfs had failed, and that his reforms, though laudable, merely created demand for greater reform. Thus, by their very action, the terrorists had unwittingly aborted The Russian Revolution: History in an Hour any chance of constitutional reform. Instead, they got a new Tsar, Alexander's son, Alexander III, who immediately tore The Russian Revolution: History in an Hour up his father's parliamentary proposal, undid his reforms and intensified the level of repression.

The new Tsar's Manifesto on Unshakable Autocracy, issued within two months of his father's death, summed up Alexander III's view on how Russia should be ruled. Liberalism and democracy were considered signs of weakness; for the benefit of The Russian Revolution: History in an Hour all, his people needed to be ruled with a firm hand and the nation needed to be more 'Russian'. Ethnic languages and nationalistic tendencies were repressed. The vast The Russian Revolution: History in an Hour empire was to be subject to the Tsar's Russification and autocratic rule.

The Tsar intended to start teaching his son The Russian Revolution: History in an Hour the art of statesmanship once Nicholas had reached the age of thirty. The Russian Revolution: History in an Hour But on 1 November 1894, aged only forty-nine, Alexander III died of kidney disease. His son was still only twenty-six. Following the death of his father, a fearful Nicholas was thrust unprepared into the limelight, reputedly asking, 'what will become of me and all of Russia?'

Russia in the early twentieth century was a mesh of nationalities and ethnicities – Ukrainian, Georgian, Finnish, Baltic, Armenian, German, and Polish among others. According to the Russian census of 1897, Russians themselves only constituted 44 The Russian Revolution: History in an Hour per cent of the Tsar's sprawling empire. This was far from a happy conglomeration of nationhood, and the Tsar needed all the mechanisms of State control to maintain command of his subjects.

Imperial Russia

Determined to follow in his father's footsteps and rule by autocratic means, Nicholas misread the underlying discontent within the empire as the malign influence of the Jew, rather than as genuine grievance. Organizations such as the pro-tsarist Black Hundreds instituted pogroms against the Jews; their communities were forced to settle in the Western reaches of the empire, the Pale of Settlement, where their movements were curtailed.
