I didn't go often to the White House. Even White House Taboo though I was a Special Agent of the United States Secret Service, my field of expertise was counterfeiting, yet it wasn't by choice. What I wanted the most was to be on the President's protection detail but in the six years I'd been working here I'd come to realize that personal preferences didn't rank high as far as the government was concerned.

This was especially true when you were a woman because being a bodyguard was still very much White House Taboo a man's domain. The only saving grace, and the reason why I was now walking through the West Wing, was because I was friends with Supervising Agent Baker.

"As you know, this isn't normal," he said.

"I know."

"This position is normally held by someone in the Uniformed Division. If my boss comes in for a surprise visit, White House Taboo I'm in for a stain on my record."

I rolled my eyes. Maybe he would get some sort of reprimand but I seriously doubted anything worse. One of the officers had called in sick and instead of having someone else from the same department fill in, Baker had called me. It helped that he owed me a favor for that time he had drunkenly kissed a secretary during the last Christmas party.

“And you understand you’re not really protecting the President doing this. You’re simply standing guard in the residence.”

“I’m the dog’s bodyguard, I know.”

He shook his head and rolled his eyes, clearly not understanding White House Taboo why I was getting White House Taboo excited about working the night shift, doing something so unglamorous. What was making it truly awesome for me was that the President – officially codenamed Grizzly – was in the White House right now. I wouldn’t get to see him but it felt like I was actually protecting him.

Baker introduced me to the other Secret Service people, fibbing about why I was actually here. I felt a little bit of an imposter with my earpiece and wrist microphone, which I never wore usually, but I had the necessary training. A few minutes later I was on my own.

The first major event happened around seven o’clock when an SUV pulled up. I was ordered to the Entrance Hall which was customarily reserved for ceremonial affairs. I stood on the White House Taboo sidelines and I was flabbergasted when President Ginwright actually showed up. In his late 40s, he looked distinguished and very presidential in spite of wearing casual clothes.

In my earpiece I heard, “Cheerleader arriving.”

That was the codename for the President’s stepdaughter. A moment later, she came in from the North Portico.

“Daddy!”

Having just turned 18, she was blonde, had a schoolgirl uniform, and she had a bounce in her step. She was so beautiful that she was popular in the teen magazines and tabloids. I pretended to look around, as my job called for, but mostly I was looking at the father taking his daughter in his arms.

They looked genuinely happy. She was back for spring break and she was a chatterbox, talking about White House Taboo her cheerleading competitions at her boarding school, the things she was studying, everything teenagers were interested about.

This spike of exhilaration didn’t last for me and soon I was back to patrolling the residence. I learned that the First Lady was at a conference in Paris to speak about cancer research. About an hour later, I White House Taboo White House Taboo was informed through the radio that Goaltender – the President’s son Reynolds – was driving in from Harvard. This time I wasn’t even needed.

Doing my rounds, I came to suspect Baker had been right all along. Maybe being White House Taboo on the protection detail wasn't all it was cracked up to be after all. As a friend in the military had once told me, it was long periods of boredom punctuated by intense moments of fear.

Nevertheless, I thought about what it would be like. I would travel across the globe, going White House Taboo to all these beautiful countries. I chuckled at the White House Taboo thought of seeing all the world's best kitchens and back alleys.
